1954 Korea

After The Korean War

Photographs by Cliff Strovers

1954

AFTER THE KOREAN WAR

In collaboration with Clifford Strovers and the Grout Museum District in Waterloo, Iowa.

Cliff Strovers was stationed in Busan, South Korea after the Korean War cease fire in 1953. For 14 months he served with the 44th Engineering Construction Group, "to begin re-building the city's infrastructure so its residents could get back on their feet." While on duty he helped construct roads, port facilities and the city's first hospital, off duty he moved around Busan and the nearby country side, photographing Koreans as they moved through their daily lives.

When he returned home to Grinnell, Iowa the photographs were placed in a tin box and stored. Fifty-five years later he pulled them from storage, digitalized them and took the copies to Korea on a return visit with his grandson. While in Busan, he met museum director Suck-hwan Dang. Impressed with the quality and subjects of the colored photographs, Mr. Dang asked Cliff's permission to exhibit his work and a book was published. Later, in Iowa, the photographs were brought to the attention of the Grout Museum District, home of the Sullivan Brothers Iowa Veterans Museum. An exhibit was developed, which premiered in Waterloo from November 2013 through March 2014.

This exhibit is now available for travel. Visitors will get a glimpse of life in Korea after the war and will experience what Cliff saw as he captured Koreans in their day to day life. Approximately 35 framed, colored photographs will be offered for display along with stories and information about Mr. Strovers.

This exhibit was produced in collaboration with Cliff Strovers and the Grout Museum District in Waterloo, Iowa.
